

losing American troops in this effort. But I will tell the Members that the young men and women who I talked to in Iraq have declared that they feel like their efforts are worthwhile, that their efforts are resulting in definite changes in Iraq, and they feel like their efforts are noble.

Mr. Speaker, we should keep in our prayers the families who lost loved ones on 9/11 and the gentlewoman from Texas (Ms. GRANGER) and the gentlewoman from New York (Mrs. KELLY) made very compelling comments about that. I would reiterate their comments that we could keep those families in our prayers, the families of 9/11, but also the families who lost loved ones in this war on Iraq.

The men and women who had done nothing wrong on 9/11, the families who have suffered so much loss deserve our continued memory and our continued remembrance. We must rid this world of the radicals who would kill innocent men, women and children. The event in Chechnya, the event in that schoolhouse, was not an isolated incident. It reflects the heinous attitude that some in the world terror community have toward other human life, even the most innocent, our children. In order to keep my grandchildren and my children safe and your grandchildren and your children safe, I would hope that we would all maintain our resolve to make sure that we all fight this war on terror in another land and not fight it here.

I would like to associate my comments with the gentleman from North Carolina, who commented that here we are fighting for freedom and the rest of the world and ministers in this country do not even have freedom of speech.
